To the Hon. the Senate and House of Representatives, in Legislature assembled,

THE undersigned beg leave to represent that a Boom from Ayer's Island, at Stillwater, to extend up and across the main Penobscot River through a portion of Ayer's Falls to the eastern shore, would greatly accommodate and advantage the Mills and those interested in the manufacture of Lumber at that place, and in case of injury to the boom above or the escape of logs or other lumber, would afford to the owners and others great facilities in the preservation of their property and save to the community a large amount of property which now annually passes down said river into tide waters, or below the mills where they can be safely and advantageously manufactured.

Wherefore we pray your hon. body to grant us an Act of Incorporation, with such immunities and restrictions as may seem just and as will subserve the interests aforesaid. And as in duty bound will ever pray.

NEWSPAPER ARCHIVE®

BANGOR,

MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1839

We are convinced that our readers will require no apology from us, for devoting our columns to the GREAT SPEECH of Mr WEBSTER. Many interesting articles of intelligence and several communications which we have laid aside for publication, must be postponed for a few days, from the necessity of continuing the Speech through several numbers of our daily and two numbers of our weekly paper.

We hope, very soon, to be able to meet the constant demands upon us for the Speech in perfect form. A pamphlet edition will be issued from this office, with no more delay than is absolutely unavoidable.

MR. WEBSTER'S SECOND SPEECH

ON THE SUB-TREASURY BILL.

Mr. President:

Having at an early stage of the debate expressed, in a general manner, my opposition to this bill, I must find an apology for again addressing the Senate, in the acknowledged importance of the measure, the novelty of its character, and the division of opinion respecting it, which is known to exist in both Houses of Congress.

To be able, in this state of things, to give a preponderance to that side of the question which I embrace, is perhaps, more than I ought to hope; but I do not feel that I have done all which my duty demands, until I make another effort.

The functions of this Government which, in time of peace, most materially affect the happiness of the people, are those which respect commerce and revenue. The bill before us, touches both these great interests. It proposes to act directly on the revenue and expenditure of Government, and it is expected to act, also, indirectly, on commerce and currency; while its friends and supporters altogether abstain from other measures, deemed by a great portion of Congress and of the country, to be indispensably demanded by the present exigency.

We have arrived, Mr. President, towards the close of a half century from the adoption of the constitution. During the progress of these years, our population has increased from three or four millions to thirteen or fourteen millions; our commerce, from little or nothing, to an export of a hundred and ninety millions; and an import of a hundred and twenty eight and a half millions, in the year 1836. Our mercantile tonnage approaches near two millions. We have a revenue, and an expenditure, of thirty millions a year. The manufactures of the country have attained very great importance, and, up to the commencement of the derangement of the currency, were in a prosperous and growing state. The produce of the fisheries has become vast; and the general production of the labor and capital of the country is increasing, far beyond all example in other countries, or other times, and has already reached an amount which, to those who have investigated the subject, would seem incredible.

The commerce of the United States, sir, is spread over the Globe. It pursues its objects in all seas, and finds its way into every port which the laws of trade do not shut against its approach. With all the disadvantages of more costly materials, and of higher wages, and often in despite of unequal and unfavorable regulations of other States, the enterprise, vigor, and economy which distinguish our navigating interest, enable it to show our flag, in competition with the most favored and the most skilful in the various quarters of the world. In the mean time, internal activity does not lag nor loiter. New and useful modes of intercourse and facilities of transportation are established, or are in progress, everywhere. Public works are projected and pushed forward, in a spirit, which grasps at high and vast objects, with a bold defiance of all expense. The aggregate value of the property of the country is augmented daily. A constant demand for a new capital exists, although a debt has already been contracted in Europe, for sums advanced to States, corporations and individuals, for purposes connected with internal improvement; which debt cannot now be less than a hundred millions of dollars. Spreading over a great extent, embracing different climates, and with vast variety of products, we find an intensely excited spirit of industry and enterprise to pervade the whole country; while its internal commerce, as I have already said, sweeps over all seas. We are connected with all commercial countries, and, most of all, with that which has established and sustained the most stupendous system of commerce and manufactures, and which collects and disburses an incredible amount of annual revenue; and which uses, to this end, and as means of currency and circulation, a mixed money of metal and paper.

Such a mixed system, sir, has also prevailed with us, from the beginning. Gold and silver, and convertible bank paper, have always constituted our actual money. The people are used to this system. It has hitherto commanded their confidence, and fulfilled their expectations. We have had, in succession, two national banks; each for a period of twenty years. Local or State banks have, at the same time, been in operation; and no man of intelligence or candor can deny that, during these forty years, and with the operation of a National and these State institutions, the currency of the country, upon the whole, has been safe, cheap convenient and satisfactory. When the Government was established, it found convertible bank paper, issued by State banks, already in circulation; and, with this circulation it did not interfere. The United States, indeed, had themselves established a bank, under the old Confederation, with authority to issue paper. A system of mixed circulation, therefore, was exactly that system which this constitution, at its adoption, found already in existence. There is not the slightest evidence of any intention, in establishing the constitution, to overthrow or abolish this system, although it certainly was the object of the constitution to abolish bills of credit, and all paper intended for circulation, issued upon the faith of the States alone. Issues of this character, whatever then existed, of the nature of money or currency, rested on State legislation; and as it was not possible that uniformity, general credit, and general confidence could result from the separate acts of the States, there is evidence, I think abundant evidence, that it was the intention of the framers of the constitution, to give to Congress a controlling power over the whole subject, so that, and that there might be, for the whole country, a currency of uniform value. Congress has heretofore exercised this authority, and fulfilled the expectation of the country. A [illegible], for forty years, a national institution, [illegible] for 20 years, and now, [illegible] the General Government. With intervals of derangement, brought about by war and other causes, this whole system, taken together, has been greatly successful in its actual operation. We have found occasion to create no difference between Government and people; between money for revenue, and money for the general use of the country. Until the commencement of the last session, Government had manifested no disposition to look out for itself exclusively. What was good enough for the people, was good enough for Government. No condescending and gracious preference had, before that period, ever been tendered to members of Congress, over other persons having claims upon the public funds. Such a singular spectacle had never been exhibited, as an amicable, disinterested, and patriotic understanding, between those who are to vote taxes on the people, for the purpose of replenishing the Treasury, and those who, from the Treasury, dispense the money back again among those who have claims on it. In that respect I think the Secretary stands alone. He is the first, so far as I know, in our long list of able heads of Departments, who has thought it a delicate and skilful touch, in financial administration, to be particularly kind and complaisant to the interest of the law-makers, those who hold the tax-laying power; the first whose great deference and cordial regard for members of Congress, have led him to provide, for them, as the medium of payment and receipt, something more valuable than is provided, at the same time, for the army, the navy, the judges, the revolutionary pensioners, and the various classes of laborers in the pay of Government.

Through our whole history, sir, we have found a convertible paper currency, under proper control, highly useful, by its pliability to circumstances, and by its capacity of enlargement, in a reasonable degree, to meet the demands of a new and enterprising community. As I have already said, sir, we owe a permanent debt of a hundred millions abroad, and in the present abundance of money in England, and the state of demand here, this amount will probably be increased. But it must be evident to every one, that, so long as, by a safe use of paper, we give some reasonable expansion to our own circulation, or at least do not unreasonably contract it, we do, to that extent, create or maintain an ability for loans among ourselves, and so far diminish the amount of annual interest paid abroad.

But let me now, Mr. President, ask the attention of another subject, upon which, indeed, much has already been said; I mean that which is usually called the CREDIT SYSTEM.

Sir, what is that system? Why is credit a word of so much solid importance, and of so powerful a charm, in the United States? Why is it that a shock has been felt through all classes and all interests, the first moment that this credit has been disturbed? Does its importance belong, equally, to all commercial States? Or are there peculiarities in our condition, our habits, and modes of business, which make credit more indispensable, and mingle it more naturally, more intimately, with the life-blood of our system?

A full and philosophical answer to these inquiries, Mr. President, would demand that I should set forth both the ground-work and the structure of our social system; It would show that the wealth and prosperity of the country have as broad a foundation as its popular constitutions. Undoubtedly there are peculiarities in that system, resulting from the nature of our political institutions, from our elementary laws, and from the general character of the people. These peculiarities most unquestionably give to credit, or to those means and those arrangements, by whatever names we call them, which are calculated to keep the whole, or by far the greater part, of the capital of the country, in a state of constant activity, a degree of importance, far exceeding what is experienced elsewhere.

In the old countries of Europe, there is a clear and well defined line between capital and labor; a line which strikes through society with a horizontal sweep, leaving on one side wealth, in masses, holden by few hands, and those having little participation in the laborious pursuits of life; on the other, the thronging multitudes of labor, with here and there, only, an instance of such accumulation of earnings as to deserve the name of capital. This distinction, indeed, is not universal and absolute, in any of the commercial states of Europe, and it grows less and less definite, as commerce advances; the effect of commerce and manufactures, as history shows, being, everywhere, to diffuse wealth, and not to and its accumulation in few hands. But still the line is greatly more broad, marked and visible in European nations, than in the United States. In those nations, the gains of capital and wages, or the earnings of labor, are not only distinct in idea, as elements of the science of political economy, but to a great degree, also, distinct in fact; and their respective claims and merits, and modes of relative adjustment, become subjects of discussion and of public regulation. Now, sir, every body may see that that is a state of things which does not exist with us. We have no such visible and broad distinction between capital and labor; and much of the general happiness of all classes results from this. With us, labor is every day augmenting its means by its own industry; not in all cases, indeed, but in very many. Its savings of yesterday, become its capital, therefore, of to day. On the other hand, vastly the greater portion of the property of the country, exists in such small quantities, that its holders cannot dispense altogether with their own personal industry; or if, in some instances, capital be accumulated till it rises to what may be called affluence, it is usually disintegrated and broken into particles again, in one or two generations. The abolition of the rights of primogeniture; the descent of property of every sort to females as well as males, the cheap and easy means by which property is transferred and conveyed, the high price of labor; the low price of land; the genius of our political institutions; in fine, every thing belonging to us, counteracts accumulation. This is our actual system. Our politics, our constitutions, our elementary laws, our habits, all centre in this point, or tend to this result. From where I now stand, to the extremity of the northeast, vastly the greatest part of the property of the country is in the hands and ownership of those whose personal industry is employed in some form of productive labor. General competence, general education, enterprise, activity and industry, such as never before pervaded any society, are the characteristics which distinguish the people who live, and move, and act in this state of things, such as I have described it.

Now, sir, if this be true, as I think it is, all must perceive that, in the United States, capital cannot say to industry, "Stand ye yonder, while I come up hither;" but labor and industry lay hold on capital, break it into parcels, use it, diffuse it widely, and, instead of leaving it to repose in its own inertness, compel it to act at once as their own stimulus and their own instrument.

But, sir, this is not all. There is another view still more [illegible] affecting the operation [illegible] equally property [illegible] property holders [illegible] live on its income. If they [illegible] they live on the rent; if it be money, they live on its interest. The amount of real estate held in this way or that is comparatively very little except in the cities. But there the widows and families, trustees and guardians, and various literary and charitable institutions, who have occasion to invest funds for the purpose of annual moneyed income. Where do they invest? Where can they invest? The answer to these questions shows at once a mighty difference between the state of things here, and that in England. Here, these investments, to produce a moneyed income, are made in banks, insurance companies, canal and rail road corporations, and other similar institutions. Placed thus immediately in active hands, this capital, it is evident, becomes at once the basis of business; it gives occupation, pays labor, excites enterprise, and performs, in short, all the functions of employed money. But, in England, investments for such purposes, usually take another direction. There is, in England, a vast amount of public stocks, as eight or nine hundred millions sterling of public debt actually exists, constituting, to the amount of its annual interest, a charge on the active capital and industry of the country. In the hands of individuals, portions of this debt are capital; that is, they produce income to the proprietors, and income without labor; while in a national point of view, it is mere debt. What was obtained for it, or that, on account of which it was contracted, has been spent in the long and arduous wars, which the country has sustained, from the time of William the Third, to our own days. There are thousands of individuals, therefore, whose fixed income arises, not from the active use of property, either in their own hands or the hands of others, but from the interest on that part of this national charge to which they are entitled. If, therefore, we use the term capital, not in the sense of political economy exactly, but as implying whatever returns income to individuals, we find an almost incalculable mass so circumstanced, as not to be the basis of active operations.

To illustrate this idea further, sir, let us suppose that, by some occurrence, (such as is certainly never to be expected,) this debt should be paid off; suppose its holders were to receive, to-morrow, their full amounts; what would they do with them? Why, sir, if they were obliged to loan the one quarter part into the hands of the industrious classes, for the purpose of employment in active business; and if this operation could be accompanied by the same intelligence and industry among the people, which prevail with us, the result would do more toward raising the character of the laboring classes, than all reforms in Parliament, and other general political operations. It would be as if this debt had never been contracted; as if the money had never been spent, and now remained part of the active capital of the country, employed in the business of life. But this debt, sir, has created an enormous amount of private property, upon the income of which, its owners live, which does not require their own active labor or that of others. We have no such debt; we have no such mode of investment; and this circumstance gives quite a different aspect and a different reality to our condition.

Now, Mr President, what I understand by the credit system is, that which thus connects labor and capital. In other words, intelligence, good character and good morals, bestow on those who have not capital, a power, a trust, a confidence, which enables them to obtain it, and to employ it usefully for themselves and others. These active men of business build their hopes of success on their attentiveness, their economy and their integrity. A wider theatre for useful activity is under their feet, and around them, than was ever spread before the eyes of the young and enterprising generations of men on any other spot enlightened by the sun. Before them is the ocean. Every thing in that direction, invites them to efforts of enterprise and industry in the pursuits of commerce. Around them on all hands, are thriving and prosperous manufactures; and improving agriculture, and the daily presentation of new objects of internal improvement: while behind them is almost half a continent of the richest land, at the cheapest prices, under healthful climates, and washed by the most magnificent rivers that on any part of the globe pay their homage to the sea. In the midst of all these glowing and glorious prospects, they are neither restrained by ignorance, nor smitten down by the penury of personal circumstances. They are not compelled to contemplate, in hopelessness and despair, all the advantages thus bestowed on their condition by Providence. Capital though they may have little or none. CREDIT supplies its place; not as the refuge of the prodigal and the reckless; not as gratifying present wants with the certainty of future and absolute ruin, but as the genius of honorable trust and confidence; as the blessing, voluntarily offered to good character and to good conduct; as the beneficent agent, which assists honesty and enterprise in obtaining comfort and independence.

Mr President, take away this credit, and what remains? I do not ask what remains to the few, but to the many? Take away this system of credit, and then tell me what is left for labor and industry but mere manual toil and daily drudgery. If we adopt a system that withdraws capital from active employment, do we not diminish the rates of wages? If we curtail the general business of society, does not every laboring man find his condition grow daily worse? In the politics of the day, sir, we hear much said of divorces; and when we abolish credit, we shall divorce labor from capital; and, depend upon it, sir, when we divorce labor from capital, capital is hoarded, and labor starves.

The declaration, so often quoted, that "all who trade on borrowed capital ought to break," is the most aristocratic sentiment ever uttered in this country. It is a sentiment which, if carried out by political arrangement, would condemn the great majority of mankind to the perpetual condition of mere day laborers. It goes to take away from them all that solace and hope which arises from possessing something which they can call their own. A man loves his own; it is fit and natural that he should do so; and he will love his country and its institutions, if he have some stake in it, although it be but a very small part of the general mass of property. If it be but a cottage, an acre, a garden, its possession raises him, gives him self respect, and strengthens his attachment to his country. It is our happy condition, by the blessings of Providence, that almost every man of sound health, industrious habits, and good morals, can ordinarily attain, at least, to this degree of comfort and respectability; and it is a result devoutly to be wished, as both for his individual and its general consequences.

But even to this degree of acquisition, that credit, of which I have already said so much, (as its general effect is to raise the price of wages, and render industry productive,) is highly important. There is no condition so low, if it be attended with industry and economy, which this credit does not benefit, as any one will find, if he will examine and follow out its operations.

Such, Mr. President, being the credit system in the U. States, as I understand it, I now add, that the banks have been, [illegible] their circulation the instrument, [illegible] which the general operations of this credit have been conducted. Much of the capital of the country, placed at interest, is loaned by banks to those who borrow. [illegible] and discounts [illegible] anticipation of payments, in all its forms, the regulated and appropriate duty of banks, prevails universally.

In the North, the banks have enabled the manufacturers of all classes, to realize the proceeds of their industry, at an early moment. The course has been, that the producers of commodities for Southern consumption, having despatched their products, draw their bills. These bills are discounted at the banks, and with the proceeds, other raw material is bought, and other labor paid; and thus the general business is continued in progress. All this is well known to those who have had opportunity to be acquainted with such concerns.

But bank credit has not been more necessary to the North than to the South. Indeed, nowhere has interest been higher, or the demand for capital greater, or the full benefit of credit more indispensable, than in the new cotton and sugar-growing States. I ask gentlemen from those States, if this be not so? Have not the plantations been bought, and the necessary labor procured, to a great extent, on credit? Has not this credit been obtained at the banks? Even now, do they not find credits, or advances on their crops, important in enabling them to get their crops to market? And if there had been no credit, if a hard money system had prevailed, let me ask them what would have been, at this moment, the condition of things in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas? These States, sir, with Tennessee and the South Atlantic States, constitute the great plantation interest. That there has been a vast demand for capital to be invested in this interest, the high price paid for the use of money, sufficiently proves.

In my opinion, sir, credit is as essential to the great export of the South, as to any other interest. The agriculture of the cotton and sugar producing States partakes, in no inconsiderable degree, of the nature of commerce. The product and sale of one great staple only, is an operation essentially different from ordinary farming pursuits. The exports of the South, indeed, may be considered as the aggregate result of various forms and modes of industry, carried on by various hands, and in various places, rather than as the mere product of the plantation. That product itself is local; but its indispensable aids and means are drawn from every part of the Union. What is it, sir, that enables Southern labor to apply itself so exclusively to the cultivation of these great articles for export? Certainly, it is so supplied, because its own necessities for provision and clothing are supplied, meanwhile, from other quarters. The South raises to sell, and not to consume; and with the proceeds of the sales it supplies itself with whatever its own consumption demands. There are exceptions; but this is the general truth. The hat-makers, shoe-makers, furniture-makers, and carriage-makers of the North, the spinners at Lowell, and the weavers at Philadelphia, are all contributors to the general product both of cotton and sugar, for export abroad; as are the live-stock raisers of Kentucky, the grain growing farmers, and all who produce and vend provisions in Indiana, Ohio and Illinois. The Northern ship-owner and the mariner, who carry these crops to market, are agents acting to the same end; and so are they too, who, little thinking of cotton fields, or sugar estates, are pursuing their adventurous employment in the whole fisheries, over the whole surface, and [illegible] all the islands of the Pacific and Indian [illegible]. If we take the annual cotton crop at sixty millions of dollars, we may, perhaps, find that the amount of forty-five millions is expended, either for interest on capital advanced, or for the expense of clothing supporting labor, or in the charges which belong to the household, the education of families, and to the domestic expenditure of the proprietor.

Thus, sir, all the laborious classes, are in truth, cotton growers and sugar makers. Each, in its own way, and to the extent of its own productiveness, contributes to swell the magnitude of that enormous export, which was nothing at the commencement of this Government, and which now has run up to so many millions. Through all these operations, the stream of credit has constantly flowed, and there is not one of them, that will not be checked and interrupted, embarrassed and thwarted, if this stream be now dried up. This connexion of the various interests of the country with one another, forms an important and interesting topic. It is one of the natural ties of the Union. The variety of production, and mutual wants mutually supplied, constitute a strong bond between different States; and long may that bond last, growing with their growth, and strengthening with their strength!

But, Mr. President, that portion of our productions which takes the form of export, becomes distinct and visible; it is prominent and striking, and is seen and wondered at, by every body. The annual returns all show it, and every day a commercial intelligence speaks of it. We gaze at it with admiration, and the world is no less admiring than ourselves.

With other branches of industry the case is quite different. The products of these branches, being put in the train of domestic exchanges, and consumed in the country, do not get into statistical tables, are not collected in masses, and are seldom presented, in the aggregate, to the public view. They are not of the character of a few large and mighty rivers, but of a thousand little streams, meandering through all the fields of business and of life, and refreshing and fertilizing the whole.

Few of us, Mr President, are aware of what would be the amount of the general production of the country, if it could be accurately ascertained. The Legislature of Massachusetts, under the direction of the intelligent Chief Magistrate of that State, has caused to be prepared and published a report on the condition and produce of certain branches of its industry, for the year ending in April, 1837. The returns of the authorities of each city and town were made, apparently with much care, and the whole has been collated by the Secretary of State, and the result distinctly presented in well-arranged statistical tables. From a summary of the statements in these tables, I will take the liberty of selecting a few articles, and of adverting to them here, as instances, or specimens, of the annual product of labor and industry in that State.

And to begin with a very necessary and important article, I find, that of boots and shoes, the value of the whole amount manufactured within the year, exceeds fourteen millions and a half of dollars. If the amount of other articles of the same class, or material, be added, viz: leather, saddles, trunks, harness, &c, the total will not be far from eighteen millions and a half of dollars.

I will read the names of some other articles, and state the amount of annual product belonging to each.

Cotton fabrics	$17,400,000
Woollen fabrics	10,300,000
Fisheries	[illegible]
Books and stationary and paper	2,595,000
Soap and candles	1,600,000
Nails [illegible]	2,[illegible]
Machinery of various kinds	1,[illegible]
Agricultural implements	[illegible]
Glass	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
Clothing, neckcloths &c.	[illegible]
Wool	2,01[illegible]
	53[illegible]

These, sir, are samples. The grand total ninety one millions seven hundred thousand dollars. From this, however, deductions must be made for the cost of the raw material imported, and for certain articles enumerated under different heads. But then, the whole statement is confined to some branches of industry only; and to present an entire and comprehensive view, there should be added the value of commerce within the year, the earnings of navigation, and almost the whole agricultural product of the State.

The result of all, if it could be collected and exhibited together, would, show that the annual product of Massachusetts capital and Massachusetts industry, exceeds one hundred millions of dollars. Now, sir, Massachusetts is a small state in extent of territory. You may mark out her dimensions even or eight times on the map of Virginia. Yet her population is seven hundred thousand souls, and the annual result of her laborious industry, economy and labor, is as I have stated.

Mr. President, in looking over this result it is most gratifying to find, that its great bulk consists in articles equally essential and useful to all classes. They are not luxuries, but necessaries and comforts. They belong to food and clothing, household convenience and education. As they are more and more multiplied the great majority of society becomes more and more elevated, better instructed, and happier in all respects. I have looked through this with delight, sir, to find what there is in it that might fairly classed among the higher luxuries of life, and what do I find? In the whole hundred millions I find out one such item; and that an item of two or three hundred thousand dollars for jewelry, silver and silver plate. This is all that belongs to luxury, in the annual product of a hundred millions; and of this, no doubt the far greater portion was sent abroad. And yet we hear daily, sir, of the alleged aristocratic wealth, by the progress of manufactures, and the operations of the credit system. Aristocracy, it is said, is stealing upon us, and in the form of aggregate wealth, is watching to seize political power from the hands of the people.

We have been more than once gravely admonished, that in order to improve the times, and restore a metallic currency for the benefit of the poor, the rich ought to melt down their plate. Whatever such a melting process might do in other quarters, Mr. President I assure you that in Massachusetts it would discover little. A few spoons, candlesticks, and other such articles, some old family pitchers and tankards, and the silver porringers of our nurseries, would be about the whole.

Sir, if there be any aristocrats in Massachusetts, the people are all aristocrats; because I do not believe there is on earth, in a highly civilized society, a greater equality in the condition of men, than there exists. If there be a man in the State who maintains what is called an equipage, or drives four horses in his coach, I am not acquainted with him. Of the other kind, there are few who are not able to keep their wives and daughters at home in church in some decent apparence. It is no matter of reproach, I know, that few are very rich, but it is our pride and our glory that few are very poor. It is our still higher pride, and our just boast, I think, that all her citizens possess means, intelligence and education; and that, of all productions, she exports, among the very best, those which spring from the culture of the mind and the heart.

Mr. President, one of the most striking characteristics of this age, is the extraordinary progress which it has witnessed in popular knowledge. A new and powerful impulse has been acting in the social system of late, producing effect in a striking degree.

In morals, in politics, in art, in literature there is a vast accession to the number of readers and to the number of proficients. The present state of popular knowledge is not the result of a slow and uniform progress, proceeding through a lapse of years with the same degree of motion. It is evidently the result of some new cause brought into powerful action, and producing consequences rapidly and strikingly. What are these causes?

This is not an occasion sir, for discussing such a question at length; allow me to say however, that the improved state of popular knowledge is but the necessary result of the improved condition of the great mass of the people. Knowledge is not one of our merely physical wants. Life may be sustained without it. But, in order to live, men must be fed, and clothed and sheltered; and in a state of things in which one's whole labor can do no more than procure clothes, food, and shelter, can he have no time or means for mental improvement? Knowledge, therefore, is not attained, and cannot be attained, till there is some degree of respite from daily manual toil, and never-ending drudgery. But whenever a less degree of labor will produce the absolute necessities of life, there comes leisure and means, both to teach and to learn.

But if this great and wonderful extension of popular knowledge be the result of an improved condition, it may, in the next place, well be asked, what are the causes which have thus slowly produced that great improvement? How is it, that the means of food, clothing, and shelter, are now so much more cheaply and abundantly procured than formerly? Sir, the main cause I take to be the progress of scientific art, or a new extent of the application of science to art. This it is which so much distinguishes the last half century in Europe and America; and its effects are every where visible, and especially among us. Man has found new allies and new auxiliaries, in the powers of nature, in the inventions of mechanism.

The general doctrine of political economy is, that wealth consists in whatever is useful or convenient to man, and that labor is the producing cause of all this wealth. This is very true. But, then, what is labor? In the sense of political writers, and in common language, it means human industry; but in a philosophical view we may receive a much more comprehensive meaning. It is not, in that meaning, human toil or drudgery. The mere action of the thews and muscles, is not any active agency, which, working upon materials, with which the world is supplied, brings forth products useful or convenient to man. The materials of wealth are in the earth, in the seas, and in their natural and unadorned productions. Labor obtains them, works them, and fashions them to human use. Now, if it has been the object of scientific art, or the application of science to art, to increase this active agency, to augment its power, by creating millions of laborers in the form of automatic machines, all to be diligently employed and kept at work by the force of natural powers. To this end the natural powers, principally of steam and falling water, are subsidized and taken into the service of man. Spinning machines, power-looms, and all the mechanical devices, which, [illegible] among other operatives, in factories and work shops, are but so many laborers. They are usually denominated la[illegible]

[illegible] that it would be [illegible] machines, they are [illegible] to have motion, and to produce [illegible] effect; and although without intelligence, they are guided by those laws of science, which are exact and perfect, and they produce results, therefore, in general, more accurate than the human hand is capable of producing. When we look upon one of these, we behold a mute fellow laborer, of immense power, of mathematical exactness, and of ever during and unwearied effort. And while he is thus a most skilful and productive laborer, he is a non consumer at least, beyond the wants of his mechanical being. He is not clamorous for food raiment, or shelter, and makes no demand for the expense of education. The eating and drinking, and reading and writing, and clothes wearing world, are benefitted by the labors of these co-operatives, in the same way as if Providence had provided for their service, millions of beings, like ourselves in external appearance, able to labor and to toil, and yet requiring little or nothing for their own consumption or subsistence, or rather, had Providence had created, a race of giants, each of whom, demanding no more for his support and consumption, than a common laborer should yet be able to perform the work of a hundred.

Now, sir, turn back to the Massachusetts tables of production, and you will see that it is these automatic allies and co operators, and these powers of nature thus employed and placed under human direction, which have come, with such prodigious effect, to mind and in the first instance of procuring the means of living, of comfort, and of wealth, and which have so swollen the products of her skilful industry. Look at these tables once more, sir, and you will see the effects of labor, united with and acting upon capital. Look yet again, and you will see that credit, mutual trust, prompt and punctual dealings, and commercial confidence, are all mixed up, as indispensable elements in the general result.

I will ask you to look yet once more, sir, and you will perceive that general competence great equality in human condition, a degree of popular knowledge and intelligence, nowhere surpassed, if any where equalled, and the prevalence of good moral sentiment, and extraordinary general prosperity, is the result of the whole. Sir, I have done with Massachusetts. I do not praise the old "Bay State" of the Revolution, I only present her as she is.

Mr President, such is the State of things actually existing in the country, and which I have now given you a sample. And yet there are persons who constantly clamor against the state of things. They call it aristocracy. They behold the poor to make war upon the rich, while in truth they know not who are either richer or poor. They complain of oppression, speculate on all the pernicious influence of an accumulated wealth. They cry out loudly against all banks and corporations, and all the means by which small capitals become united, in order to produce important and beneficial results. They carry on a crusade against all established institutions. They would choke up the fountains of industry, and dry all its streams.

In a country of unbounded liberty, they clamor for aggression. In a country of perfect equality they would move heaven and earth against privilege and monopoly. In a country where poverty is more equally divided than any where else, they rend the air with the shouting of agrarian doctrines. In a country where the wing of thought is given to go beyond all parallel, and where famous works of art and the means of living low, they would teach the laborer that he is an oppressed slave. Sir, what can such men want? What do they mean? They can want nothing but to enjoy the fruits of other men's labor. They can mean nothing, but disturbance and disorder, the diffusion of corrupt principles and the destruction of the moral sentiments and social habits of society. A hideous mass of feeling and of action is sometimes produced by property itself. Men cannot always see the temptation to which they are exposed by the very abundance of the bounties of Providence, and the very happiness of their own condition, in the steel hard of the pasture, will, sometimes, throw himself against its enclosures, break away from its confinement and, feeling now his freedom, needless restraint, betake himself to the moors and barrens where want ere long brings him to his senses, and starvation and death close his career.

Having said so much, sir, on the general condition of the country, and explained what I understand by credit, I proceed to consider the present state of the currency.

A fire took place on Saturday morning between the hours of eight and nine, in an unoccupied house owned by Allen Gilman, Esq and Dr H Rich, on Exchange street. The fire companies repaired immediately to the spot and were not long in extinguishing it. The building however was much damaged, and the owners sustain a considerable loss as it was not insured. There is little doubt that it was the work of an incendiary—the tenement not having been occupied for several weeks.

CARD.

The undersigned beg leave to tender their thanks to the members of the Fire Department, for their prompt and efficient exertions in arresting the progress of the fire in their buildings on Saturday morning.

ALLEN GILMAN,

CARD

Alec S Whitman tenders his thanks to the Fire Department for the promptness and spirit with which they mustered "All hands to the rescue" of his dwelling from danger on Saturday morning.

NEW AND VALUABLE SCHOOL BOOK!

THE attention of School Committees, Teachers and Parents is invited to the examination of the "JUVENILE READER," a selection of easy Reading Lessons, by a Teacher, a new edition of which, revised and corrected, we have just published. It is believed that the book is one which has been very much wanted in our common schools, and indeed it was compiled at the request of many of our best Teachers. The compiler is a gentleman of known abilities, and long experience in his profession. The pieces in this book, are chiefly selected from popular works designed for youth, and it is believed, will have a healthy moral influence in those schools in which it is adopted. The book comes at a very low price and has been adopted in a great many Schools with decided approbation, and having been stereotyped, is free from the danger of having any alterations made in it, which is the greatest trouble with all school books.

Those connected with schools, or interested in any manner, are requested to call and examine it.

A CARD.

The subscriber most respectfully announces to his friends and the public generally, that at the earnest solicitations of the proprietors, he has assumed the charge of the HAMPDEN HOUSE, Conscious of the difficult task to please all, he nevertheless flatters himself he will be able to give general satisfaction by strict personal attention to the wants and wishes of those who may patronize the establishment. His Bar will be constantly supplied with choice Liquors, and his Larder with the best the market affords.

The spacious Hall connected with the house is in fine order. Ball and Parties can be accommodated, and Music of the first talent provided (if required) at the shortest notice, and at reasonable charges; and while he shall always be happy to wait upon company from the city, he will endeavor at the same time to render the house what in fact it should be, the resting place of the weary traveller and the stranger's home. In short he will not only endeavor to sustain, but to improve the reputation of the Hampden House, relying at all times upon the liberality of a generous public for that patronage which it will always be his aim to merit.

NEW MAGAZINE OF VARIETIES BENTLEY'S MISCELLANY,

EDITED BY "BOZ," with illustrations by Cruikshank. "Never has a periodical more earnestly fulfilled its promises than this hilarious magazine. It undertook to be comical, and it is comical almost to a fault. The humor of Boz is humor per se: there is nothing like it; nothing so good in its way; and it would appear that the springs from which it is drawn are inexhaustible. [London Atlas.]

The extraordinary share of popularity this Comic Periodical is said to have experienced in England under the editorial management of Charles Dickens, Esq. has led the subscriber to believe that an American edition of a work of such high repute for wit and talent would, in addition to the Reprints of Reviews and Magazines of a character already issued by him, be acceptable: he therefore, respectfully takes leave to announce to the public his determination to commence an American series (in similie of the original) of Bentley's Miscellany, with the January numbers of the present year, 1838 and which he may expect to have ready during the month of February.

Many editors of journals of acknowledged taste have extracted copiously from the numbers of the Miscellany as they have appeared, and the Pickwick Papers, emanating from the pen of the talented editor, is now in course of profitable republication in this country. The character of the Work, therefore, from these circumstances, it may be presumed is so far favorably known as partially to have received the stamp of public approbation, which encourages the proprietor to hope that in being the mere humble instrument of presenting the first complete reprint of BENTLEY'S MISCELLANY to the literati of the United States he has not mistaken the public taste; and if his inference in this respect be correct, he may, with confidence, look forward to the result.

WM. LEWER,
Broadway, corner of Pine Street.

Conditions—I. The Work will be issued in monthly numbers as quickly after the receipt of the original copy as practicable. Price 50 cents per number, or Five Dollars per annum, payable in advance.

II. It will be handsomely printed in a bold type on a paper of first rate quality, size demy 8vo; and stitched up in a cover of unique design, and be made in every respect to correspond with the London edition. Subscriptions rec'd by
